National Academy of Public Administration and University of Southern California's Price School of Public Policy Hold Forum on Challenges Facing State Governments

"Governing Across the Divide" Event to Focus on Environmental & Healthcare Policies

WASHINGTON, DC – The National Academy of Public Administration and the University of Southern California's Sol Price School of Public Policy will hold a one-day forum in Sacramento, California on August 29th to examine the challenges facing state governments, particularly in the areas of environmental and healthcare policy, as well as the changing role of states in the U.S. intergovernmental system.

"Our last election exposed an electorate dramatically divided across many categories—geography, income, education, race, and gender, to name a few—with very different perspectives on the nation's best path to the future," said Terry Gerton, President and CEO of the National Academy of Public Administration. "We want to gather the best and the brightest in order to learn more about how states can best govern across the divide."

During this first of four regional Governing Across the Divide events initiated by the Academy, government officials, academics and thought leaders from across the public, private, and nonprofit sectors will debate the changing roles of states in the areas of environmental policy and programs, health care, and their relationships with local government partners. The forum will focus on identifying both best practices and the gaps and obstacles that hinder states from taking the actions they believe are necessary to meet the needs of their populations.

"We are honored to host the launch of Governing Across the Divide in California's state Capitol and to participate in asking critical questions at a critical point in our history," said Jack H. Knott, dean of the USC Sol Price School of Public Policy.

The four-part Governing Across the Divide series seeks to draw out the governance challenges facing leaders at the federal, state, and local levels and propose a national agenda for improving the government's effectiveness in delivering services to its citizens. Additional events will take place in the fall in Texas, New York and the Washington, DC area.
